Additional comments Import permits are sometimes issued to Appendix II species to allow the Management Authority to better monitor trade, particularly the persons/businesses involved in the trade and the particular nature of the trade itself.

Some domestic laws do provide for stricter management of CITES listed species. Veterinary Services under their Animals (Diseases and Importation) Act can prohibit the importation of certain species e.g. venomous snakes, and there has been a general policy to prohibit the importation of snake species exceeding six feet at maturity. Some species are also restricted because of other specific pieces of legislation e.g. the Coastal Zone Management Act (1998-39) which promotes the protection of marine resources, restricts the taking and destruction of coral as well. It can also designate Marine Protected Areas and Marine Parks. Similarly, the Fishery Management Regulations (1998) and the Fisheries Act 1993 (cap. 391) have the power to administer closed areas and seasons, e.g. there is a moratorium on sea turtles, and a complete ban on the harvesting of white sea urchins.
